INTRODUCTION

Special Counsel Robert Mueller is conducting an investigation into Russia’s interference in the 2016 presidential election and the possible coordination and cooperation with the Donald Trump presidential campaign.<sup>1</sup> The investigation has raised numerous legal questions with serious political and legal implications.<sup>2</sup> Chief among them is whether a sitting President can be indicted and prosecuted for criminal wrongdoing.<sup>3</sup> A related question is whether and to what extent, in the event of an official investigation, a sitting President can be compelled to provide evidence—in the form of oral and written testimony, as well as documentary evidence.<sup>4</sup> Finally, assuming there is potential criminal liability, does a sitting President have the power to issue a self-pardon?<sup>5</sup> These are relatively novel questions in the law, and it is not surprising there is little guidance from the courts given the reluctance by most judges to weigh in on potentially serious political questions.<sup>6</sup>

This Article intends to clarify some of the more difficult legal issues in our nation's separation of powers jurisprudence. In order to afford the President the flexibility and discretion necessary to discharge presidential duties, the courts are almost certainly going to recognize total immunity from the criminal process for the President with respect to official conduct.<sup>7</sup> The treatment of unofficial conduct is less predictable.<sup>8</sup> Based on precedent and our nation's founding principles of equal justice and fairness, the courts are likely to hold that a sitting President is not above the law and thus does not enjoy immunity from criminal prosecution for unofficial acts or conduct unrelated to his or her fitness to hold office.<sup>9</sup> However, because of separation of powers considerations, the courts are likely to require deferral of any such prosecution until the President no longer holds office.<sup>10</sup> Although not as clear, constitutional considerations would likely also require deferral of any investigation or indictment, at least those requiring the direct and material participation of the President.<sup>11</sup> On the other hand,

4. This question was partly addressed in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 706 (1974), but the Court did not reach the issue of compelling a President to respond to subpoenas ad testificandum—the production of oral testimony.

I. PRESIDENTIAL IMMUNITY

Our nation was founded on the principle of the rule of law. This means that the law is applied equally to every person, and no person is above the law.<sup>16</sup> This is one of the foundational tenets of our system of government, a belief so basic to Americans, so ingrained in our culture, as to be beyond question or serious disagreement.<sup>17</sup> Justice demands that people be held accountable for their actions.<sup>18</sup> Indeed, one could argue that the failure to prosecute someone in the face of evidence of criminal activity—including an incumbent President—would undermine confidence in our government institutions and seriously impair the integrity of the criminal justice process.<sup>19</sup> For these reasons, it may appear obvious that a President who engages in wrongdoing can be subject to criminal prosecution. It is worth noting, though, that in our nation's long history of remarkable yet imperfect Presidents, none have ever been prosecuted while in office for a crime.<sup>20</sup>

A. Distinguishing Official and Unofficial Conduct

Common sense supported by the weight of history tells us that every President will have to make controversial decisions while in office.<sup>21</sup> Those decisions flowing either directly or indirectly from the President's duties and responsibilities under the Constitution and laws of the United States typically qualify as "official acts."<sup>22</sup> Some official decisions will be unpopular; still others will give rise to claims of illegality.

Imposing criminal liability upon a sitting President who acts in good faith, often on the advice of government lawyers, could have a chilling effect on the President's decision-making.<sup>23</sup> It could paralyze a President from undertaking controversial measures that he or she considers necessary to serve American interests.<sup>24</sup> Guarding against this paralysis is arguably more important to the welfare of our nation than imposing criminal liability to conduct that rarely occurs, especially when there are other adequate means to hold a President accountable.<sup>25</sup> In other words, the interest in punishing official presidential actions that are taken in good faith but which some may view as violating the law nevertheless does not outweigh the significant burden that even attempted criminal prosecution would impose on the office of the President.<sup>26</sup>

Additionally, no President can effectively govern or make necessary personnel decisions if subordinates within the executive branch have the power to judge, second-guess, or challenge the President's authority and decision-making in an official capacity.<sup>27</sup> Watergate Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski disagrees, arguing that the government in practice is supervised through executive departments and agencies without direct presidential supervision.<sup>28</sup> While true to a degree, our constitutional structure of separation of powers places the ultimate power and responsibility of the executive branch in the hands of the President,<sup>29</sup> and he or she must be able to govern without fear of retaliation or insubordination by other executive branch officials, including prosecutors at the Justice Department.<sup>30</sup>

In the case of Nixon v. Fitzgerald, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a sitting President enjoys complete immunity from civil liability for actions taken while in office, reasoning that the President must be able to make decisions and take actions for our country without fear of civil liability.<sup>31</sup> Based on this precedent, courts will likely recognize absolute immunity from federal criminal process in connection with the President's official conduct, which extends to "all acts within the 'outer perimeter' of [the President's] official responsibility."<sup>32</sup>

Fitzgerald itself acknowledges a key textual issue with any argument supporting presidential immunity: the Constitution contains no express grant of immunity from liability for the President for either official or unofficial conduct.<sup>33</sup> The absence of an express grant of executive immunity was significant to Professor Ronald Rotunda, who in 1998, wrote to Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr that the Constitution explicitly grants limited immunity to lawmakers for certain actions.<sup>34</sup> "If the Framers of our Constitution had wanted to create some constitutional privilege to shield the President," he argued, "they could have drafted such a privilege."<sup>35</sup> With due respect to Professor Rotunda, our Supreme Court jurisprudence includes many examples where the Court has found an implied grant of constitutional authority.<sup>36</sup> In Fitzgerald, the Supreme Court found an implied grant of immunity with respect to official conduct. Thus, the mere absence of an express grant of immunity to the President in the Constitution does not foreclose the possibility that some form of immunity from the criminal process exists. What is yet unknown—and what this Article addresses—is the type and scope of any such immunity or protection.

Although the President may be “on duty” twenty-four hours a day, he or she does not engage in official acts twenty-four hours a day.<sup>37</sup> As part of daily living, some conduct is inevitably going to be personal and unrelated to the duties of the office.<sup>38</sup> For example, when the President plays golf with siblings, clears cedar bush on private property, or goes horseback riding with long-time friends, he or she is not acting in an official capacity.<sup>39</sup> Furthermore, no one can credibly argue that murdering a political rival or assaulting a media critic would constitute an official duty.<sup>40</sup> Likewise, if the President were to lie to federal prosecutors to protect a family member or political ally, or take other similar actions to obstruct a legitimate federal investigation, such conduct would, and should, be characterized as unofficial.<sup>41</sup> While effective governance may depend on the courts’ recognition of absolute immunity for official government actions, the same need does not exist with respect to unofficial conduct.

In the Supreme Court case of Clinton v. Jones involving personal conduct by then Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton, the Court held that a sitting President can be subjected to a civil proceeding in federal court and to civil liability for unofficial actions, such as those taken before assuming office.<sup>42</sup> In part, the decision in Jones depended on the fact that the conduct at issue was committed before President Clinton took office; for this reason, the Court classified the conduct as “unofficial acts.”<sup>43</sup> It is unclear whether the Court intended to signal that all conduct prior to taking office were “unofficial acts,” while all conduct in office were “official acts.”<sup>44</sup> Did the Court leave open the possibility that certain conduct, by its very nature, could still be an unofficial act even when committed by a sitting President?

On the one hand, one could argue that every presidential action or decision, whether large or small, personal, political, or policy-driven, is an “official act.”<sup>45</sup> Whatever the nature of the activity or motivation may be, every activity or conduct would necessarily divert the President’s time and attention from the business of the people, including those that might appear personal or unofficial. On the other hand, there are clearly certain actions which by their very nature would be commonly understood to be unrelated to the President’s official duties.<sup>46</sup>

The distinction between official and unofficial acts was significant to Professor Rotunda, who wrote that “it is proper, constitutional, and legal for a federal grand jury to indict a sitting President for serious criminal acts that are not part of, and are contrary to, the President’s official duties.”<sup>47</sup> Admittedly, depending on the circumstances, it may be difficult to determine whether conduct is official or unofficial.<sup>48</sup> Any test based on the character or nature of the President’s conduct requires prosecutors and juries to discern intent and motive, and places judges in the untenable position of having to second-guess the Commander-in-Chief and Chief Executive of the United States.<sup>49</sup> While distinguishing official and unofficial conduct may prove too difficult for a comprehensive bright-line test, a judge in any case might simply conclude, “I don’t know where the ultimate line should be drawn between official and unofficial acts, but it does not matter here. Clearly, killing someone or lying to federal prosecutors to protect a family member are not official acts. I don’t have to draw the line for all cases, I just

45. However, such a definition, if applied broadly enough, could effectively immunize the President from any number of activities not closely related to his or her official duties.

46. For example, private moments between a President and spouse and between a President and the President’s children are likely to be viewed as unofficial, and conduct before assuming office is very likely to be labelled categorically unofficial. See Jones, 520 U.S. at 686.

47. ROTUNDA MEMO, supra note 34, at 55 (emphasis added).

48. It should be noted that the dividing line between official and unofficial conduct has to do with the nature and functions of the Presidential office and is not dependent on alleged harms or crimes. For example, former President Bill Clinton was named in a civil complaint that accused him of conspiring to commit securities fraud. In re Global Crossing, Ltd., 314 F. Supp. 2d 172, 173 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). The district court held that the former President’s actions were official conduct and granted his motion to dismiss, reasoning that conduct will not be deemed unofficial “merely by reciting that official acts were part of an unlawful conspiracy”). Id. at 175.

Some commentators note that official conduct can nonetheless implicate other constitutional principles that further limit the “outer perimeter” of official conduct, such as the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition on animus in governmental action. See Douglas B. McKechnie, @POTUS: Rethinking Presidential Immunity in the Time of Twitter, 72 U. MIAMI L. REV. 1, 19, 22–24 (2017). However, these theories can lead to constitutional tests that are difficult and arbitrary to implement in practice.

49. See Freedman, supra note 18, at 47–48 (describing the functional approach the Court often uses to determine the scope of immunity and official conduct).

have to draw it for this case.” Courts frequently engage in this kind of fact-specific determination.<sup>50</sup>

A test based on when the conduct occurred appears easier to administer.<sup>51</sup> On balance, however, the right approach to determining official and unofficial conduct should examine the nature of the conduct as opposed to the timing of the conduct.<sup>52</sup> To hold otherwise would result in a de facto grant of immunity for all acts, official and unofficial, during a President’s term in office.<sup>53</sup>

In determining what crimes the President could be liable for, Special Prosecutor Jaworski was prepared to recognize an exception for “ordinary violent crime[s,]” such as murder.<sup>54</sup> Such crimes clearly fall outside the scope of the President’s official duties. Using this reasoning, juries and judges should be capable of discerning official conduct from non-official conduct based on common sense and practice. Some cases will be obvious, others not so. For example, if the presidential conduct at issue is supported by an express or implied grant of authority in the Constitution or by statute, based on legal advice by government lawyers, or grounded on court precedent, then the conduct would fit squarely within the safe harbor of presidential immunity protection.<sup>55</sup> Ultimately, there is a material difference between official and unofficial acts, and holding the President accountable for unofficial acts is consistent with our notions of fairness and accountability.

B.J.F.*, 491 U.S. 524, 533 (1989)) (First Amendment and privacy rights cases require “relying on limited principles that sweep no more broadly than the appropriate context of the instant case”); Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649 (1993) (“We hold only that, on the facts of this case, appellants have stated a claim sufficient to defeat the state appellees’ motion to dismiss.”); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 365 (1978) (“We hold only that the course of conduct engaged in by the prosecutor in this case . . . did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.”).

51. Such a test would categorically deem all conduct prior to assuming office “unofficial conduct.” See Jones, 520 U.S. at 686 (emphasizing that the conduct at issue “occurred before [the President] was elected to that office”).

52. See Forrester v. White, 484 U.S. 219, 224 (1988) (The Court “examine[s] the nature of the functions with which a particular official or class of officials has been lawfully entrusted, and . . . seek[s] to evaluate the effect that exposure to particular forms of liability would likely have on the appropriate exercise of those functions.”).

53. As this Article contends, no person is above the law. A categorical and permanent immunity for all conduct in which a sitting President engages would place the President above the law; therefore, a temporal test fails to comport with the rule of law and is rejected.

54. Griffin, supra note 49, at 59–60.

B. The Timing of Prosecution for Unofficial Criminal Conduct

Assuming the President is subject to criminal process for unofficial acts, can a President be investigated, indicted, and prosecuted for such conduct while in office, or should such prosecution be deferred until the President no longer holds office? In Clinton v. Jones, the Court concluded that the burdens of defending against civil litigation in federal court would not unduly encumber the President in discharging the duties of the office on behalf of the American people.<sup>56</sup> The Court's conclusion has been the subject of some debate.<sup>57</sup> Even accepting as true the Court's reasoning with regard to civil litigation, the burdens are significantly different and more serious in the criminal justice context due to the risk of incarceration or loss of civil liberties.<sup>58</sup> Admittedly, if a private party can sue a sitting President for unofficial acts, then one could argue that an indictment and prosecution is constitutional because the public interest in criminal cases are generally greater.<sup>59</sup> Such an argument, however, fails to consider the wide gamut of competing interests at issue with regard to prosecuting a sitting President.

The government's official position is set out by the Office of Legal Counsel in the Department of Justice (the "OLC") in two legal opinions, one published in 1973, and the other published in 2000.<sup>60</sup> In the latter opinion, the OLC opined "that the indictment and criminal prosecution of a sitting President would unduly interfere with the ability of the executive branch to perform its constitutionally assigned duties."<sup>61</sup> This conclusion reaffirmed the OLC's understanding, expressed in the earlier opinion, and reinforces this Article's determination that the President's official acts are subject to total immunity.<sup>62</sup>

The two OLC opinions make clear that allowing the prosecution of a sitting President, even for unofficial acts, would violate separation of powers by essentially giving the judiciary the power through the criminal justice process to dictate the President's schedule and priorities—a power that in extreme cases could effectually constitute a de facto removal of the sitting President.<sup>63</sup> Allowing a federal prosecutor and grand jury to indict and try the President gives them a position of control over a branch of government that was never contemplated by our Founders.<sup>64</sup>

The President is certainly unique in our constitutional structure, unlike any other public official in the extent of control of one branch of our federal government.<sup>65</sup> In the “Bork Brief”—a memorandum of law filed by Solicitor General Robert H. Bork—Mr. Bork argued that Vice President Spiro Agnew was subject to criminal prosecution but that the President was not subject to such criminal prosecution because of his unique constitutional role.<sup>66</sup> It must be noted that any investigation of a President is almost certain to become public; the media scrutiny alone will place a great deal of stress on the White House. Depending on the circumstances and the methods employed by investigators and prosecutors, an investigation and indictment could be very distracting for a sitting President.<sup>67</sup>

Some commentators argue that a criminal proceeding implicating the President is no more disruptive to the work of the government than impeachment proceedings.<sup>68</sup> Thus, they assert there is no reason that a criminal prosecution would or should constitute an improper disruption or removal from office in violation of separation of powers.<sup>69</sup> This assertion is undercut by the fact that impeachment is expressly contemplated in the Constitution as a means to remove a President.<sup>70</sup> In fact, as every first-year law student learns, other than the procedures set out in the Twenty-Fifth Amendment to our Constitution, impeachment is the only method explicitly included in the Constitution as a means to remove a President from office.<sup>71</sup>

On the other hand, at least one former Department of Justice official believes that since Vice President Aaron Burr was indicted while in office for conspiracy to create an independent country in the southwestern United States,<sup>72</sup> there should be no different rules for a President.<sup>73</sup> But anyone with direct knowledge of the role and responsibilities of a Vice President can appreciate the possible different treatment because of the vast difference between serving as President and serving as Vice President.<sup>74</sup>

Given the present highly politicized environment in Washington, D.C.,<sup>75</sup> an indictment and prosecution of a sitting President would likely result in a major and potentially lengthy disruption of an entire branch of government.<sup>76</sup> In recognition of the unique role of the President as head of the executive branch, any prosecution of a sitting President in connection with unofficial acts should be deferred until such time as the President no longer holds office.<sup>77</sup> While investigation and indictment would be of great interest to the public and Congress, if such actions require the direct and material participation of the President, they should likewise be deferred unless such actions have been specifically authorized by Congress.<sup>78</sup>

In rejecting this proposition, one commentator suggests that the national public would not necessarily suffer following the successful prosecution of the President because the presidency could still be conducted from a jail cell.<sup>79</sup> Yes, the President would still be physically able to discharge the duties of the office. However, images of the leader of the free world operating from prison would undoubtedly diminish the stature of the office and undercut this nation's reputation and standing in the world.<sup>80</sup> It would likely embolden our enemies.

Other scholars remind us that there are multiple remedies to fill the vacuum created by an incapacitated President, such as presidential succession, delegations of power, and replacement under the Twenty-Fifth

Amendment of the Constitution.<sup>81</sup> They posit that our Founders anticipated irregular changes or interruptions in the office of the President and put in place contingencies to respond to such vacancies.<sup>82</sup> The Rotunda Memo argues that the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, which allows for temporary replacement of a President who is unable to carry out the duties of the office, provides a mechanism that would keep the executive branch operational if the President were on trial.<sup>83</sup>

The Twenty-Fifth Amendment was intended to apply to situations where the President is “unable to discharge the powers and duties of the office” because of some inability.<sup>84</sup> The amendment does not define “unable to discharge” or “inability,” and so provides flexibility to the constitutional decision makers at a time of crisis in terms of reasons for removal.<sup>85</sup> One must concede that the language of the amendment appears broad enough to (1) allow an imprisoned President to voluntarily transfer power and (2) allow the constitutional decision makers—if they deemed it necessary—to forcibly remove the President should he or she be imprisoned while in office.<sup>86</sup> Technically, however, the President would not be disabled or unable to discharge the powers and duties of the office. XXV, § 3.

85. See Freedman, supra note 18, at 51–59. Freedman argues that the Twenty-Fifth Amendment is a practically limitless method of presidential removal, contingent upon little more than procedural requirements and a sufficient congressional vote. Id. at 54–56. However, Freedman’s argument has yet to be seen in history since each use of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment removal power has been exercised for the purposes of removing a President for physical disability. See Symposium, Fifty Years After the Twenty-Fifth Amendment: Recommendations for Improving the Presidential Succession System, 86 *FORDHAM L. imprisonment has impeded but not entirely precluded the President's ability to discharge the powers and duties of the office remains a legitimate question.<sup>87</sup>

The OLC opinions recognize a "temporary immunity" from liability.<sup>88</sup> The concept of a temporary immunity from liability is not one commonly used or found in the law.<sup>89</sup> For that matter, use of the term "immunity" has caused some confusion among commentators.<sup>90</sup> The OLC opinions unequivocally conclude that a sitting President enjoys total and complete immunity from liability in connection with official actions.<sup>91</sup> Furthermore, the OLC opinions are consistent with the position that any criminal liability of the President for unofficial actions should also be temporarily stayed or deferred until the President no longer holds office.<sup>92</sup> Technically, there is no immunity for the President for unlawful unofficial conduct, which squares with the principle that no man is above the law.<sup>93</sup> The end result under the OLC opinions is that the President is accountable for his or her unlawful unofficial conduct, but not subject to prosecution until after he or she has

88. 2000 OLC MEMO, supra note 58, at 238. The 1973 OLC Memo recognizes the concept of deferral of prosecution; however, it is discussed in the context of indictment during the President's term and deferral of prosecution until after office. 1973 OLC MEMO, supra note 60, at 29. Although the 1973 OLC Memo acknowledges that, in theory, such a process could "minimiz[e] direct interruption of official duties," it ultimately rejects the idea, reasoning that a lingering indictment "would damage the institution of the Presidency virtually to the same extent as an actual conviction." Id.

89. Examples of courts recognizing a temporary immunity are, admittedly, few and unrelated. See, e.g., Iron Bear v. Jones, 32 N.W.2d 125, 129 (Neb. 1948) (failure to execute a prisoner on day scheduled creates only temporary immunity from execution until new date is scheduled); In re Herron, 73 A. 599, 599 (N.J. 1909) (temporary immunity from execution for "mentally deranged" prisoner until the prisoner recovers sanity); J.W. Field Co. v. Franklin, 499 A.2d 251, 258 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. 1985) (temporary immunity against certain builder's remedy suits while municipality revises ordinances); Goot v. Bd. of Educ., 440 N.Y.S.2d 403, 405 (N.Y. App. Div. 1981) (upholding state statute providing temporary immunity from civil suits for soldiers on active duty).

90. See generally Akhil Reed Amar & Neal Kumar Katyal, Executive Privileges and Immunities: The Nixon and Clinton Cases, 108 HARV. L. REV. 702 (1995) (distinguishing between "permanent" and "temporary" immunity in civil suits). While the Supreme Court ultimately decided not to defer litigation in Jones, see Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681 (1997), Amar and Katyal's argument remains helpful in distinguishing permanent immunity from the type of "temporary immunity from such criminal process" that the 2000 OLC Memo proposed. See 2000 OLC MEMO, supra note 58, at 238. Certainly, the idea of permanent immunity for unofficial criminal conduct most strongly offends the rule of law. However, a temporary "immunity"—what this Article refers to as "deferment"—places the President under the rule of law in such a way as to hold him or her accountable without destroying deeply rooted notions of separation of powers and constitutional executive obligations.

One former federal prosecutor has publicly questioned the impartiality and quality of the legal work of the OLC, observing that OLC memoranda are not traditional legal analyses and arguing that because the lawyers in the OLC serve the executive branch, they are inherently biased.<sup>95</sup> The fact remains, however, that OLC opinions represent the formal legal position of the entire Justice Department and are binding upon all Department of Justice prosecutors unless and until an opinion is withdrawn by the OLC or countermanded by the President or Attorney General.<sup>96</sup> Those who question the impartiality of the lawyers in the OLC fail to appreciate that the Attorney General is charged by statute to provide legal advice to the executive branch, and has delegated this statutorily-provided authority to the lawyers in the OLC.<sup>97</sup>

How the Supreme Court would ultimately answer this question of presidential immunity and possible deferment of prosecution is unclear. Both Special Prosecutor Jaworski and Independent Counsel Starr reportedly concluded that a sitting President could be indicted and prosecuted for unofficial acts.<sup>98</sup> It appears that their determinations were based largely on the origins of their statutory authority from Congress.<sup>99</sup> Although a congressional statute cannot override the constitutional protections and rights of a President, courts will give weight to formal congressional actions when determining the scope of presidential power and authorities.<sup>100</sup> In the case of the Russia investigation, for example, the authority of Special Counsel Mueller flows directly from that of the Department of Justice and Deputy Attorney General.<sup>101</sup> Consequently, Special Counsel Mueller is bound by the operative Justice Department views as to whether a sitting President can be prosecuted while in office. Based on the few relevant court decisions and the views of the Justice Department,<sup>102</sup> the courts are likely to conclude that the President of the United States can be criminally liable for unofficial acts but cannot be prosecuted until after leaving office because of separation of powers concerns.<sup>103</sup>

Deferring an investigation or indictment could be problematic.<sup>104</sup> On the one hand, delaying the investigation increases the risk that evidence is lost, destroyed, or grows stale. Witnesses may die or become unavailable.<sup>105</sup> Memories become weaker over time.<sup>106</sup> Additionally, delaying an investigation may deny Congress information relevant to assessing whether impeachment and removal is warranted.<sup>107</sup>

On the other hand, an investigation and subsequent indictment is likely to disrupt the work of the White House and divert the President's attention.<sup>108</sup> Arguably, the indictment of a sitting President would usurp the role of the House of Representatives under the Constitution to bring charges against a President for high crimes and misdemeanors.<sup>109</sup> Any investigation

104. When pressing questions of constitutional law come before the Court, especially those concerning separation of powers and the President, they often grant certiorari on an expedited basis. See, e.g., United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. at 687 (Supreme Court recognizing “the public importance of the issues presented and the need for their prompt resolution”). However, in a case where the question is whether the sitting President can be indicted or prosecuted, the question is not whether the President is guilty but whether such criminal process may proceed. Thus, the Court could promptly answer the preliminary question and then determine—as this Article argues—that criminal process should be deferred until the President is no longer in office.

105. Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 521 (1972). Note, however, the unique situation in Barker. The defendant was indicted on September 15, 1958, for the death of an elderly couple on July 20th earlier that year. Id. at 516. During the course of the criminal proceedings, the prosecution obtained a total of 16 continuances, and the defendant was tried a total of six times, before being found guilty for the murder of one victim during the fifth trial and guilty for murdering the other victim at the sixth trial in December 1962—almost four and a half years after the murder. Id. at 516–17. The Supreme Court held that the defendant “was not deprived of his due process right to a speedy trial.” Id. at 536. The Court reasoned that “any inquiry into a speedy trial claim necessitates a functional analysis of the right in the particular context of the case . . . .” Id. at 522. In fact, the Court explained “that deprivation of the right may work to the accused’s advantage” and thus “does not per se prejudice the accused’s ability to defend himself.” Id. at 521.

109. “The House of Representatives . . . shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.” U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 5.

by state prosecutors will implicate federalism concerns, as discussed below. Therefore, unless Congress passes a statute authorizing an investigation of a sitting President for unofficial acts,<sup>110</sup> the arguments for proceeding with an investigation and possible indictment do not carry significant weight when compared to the significant burden on the office of the President that would result.<sup>111</sup>

A final but related question is whether the President can be prosecuted while in office for crimes committed before becoming President. Such conduct would, of course, constitute an unofficial act.<sup>112</sup> Unlike for civil offenses, the weight of authority suggests the President cannot be prosecuted while in office for the reasons set forth above. Deferring criminal liability for conduct as a private citizen may seem inconsistent with the imposition of civil liability on a President for conduct prior to assuming office.<sup>113</sup> The differing treatment is justified by the nature of the criminal proceedings and may be attributable to the additional time and attention a criminal trial would require of the President.<sup>114</sup> Of course, the analysis might be different if Congress were to pass legislation authorizing prosecution under these circumstances.<sup>115</sup> Finally, irrespective of the President's liability while in office, the President could be prosecuted for such crimes after leaving office.

C. Federalism Concerns: State Prosecution of a Sitting President

The question of presidential immunity and the deferment of prosecution also raises federalism-type considerations. If a President can be prosecuted for unofficial acts by federal prosecutors, then state and local prosecutors would, theoretically, have similar authority with respect to presidential unofficial conduct in violation of state and local laws.<sup>116</sup> States have a strong public interest in prosecuting criminal wrongdoing by anyone in their jurisdiction, including wrongdoing by the President. It is not hard to imagine a local or state prosecutor bringing criminal charges against an unpopular President in order to advance his or her own political career.<sup>117</sup> Having to defend against these kinds of shenanigans would undoubtedly distract the President from the business of the American people.<sup>118</sup>

One opponent of temporary immunity and prosecution deferral has noted that “the state courts have uniformly ruled that officers who are subject to impeachment are also subject to indictment while still in office, and that states in fact regularly bring criminal proceedings against their officeholders.”<sup>119</sup> While true, this argument fails to recognize the federalism issues inherent in a state prosecution of a federal officeholder.<sup>120</sup> Further, this argument fails to acknowledge that states are separate sovereigns with their own unique constitutional schemes.<sup>121</sup> In Texas, for example, the state Attorney General is a constitutional officer elected statewide, separately from the Governor.<sup>122</sup> Unlike the U.S. Attorney General who is appointed by the President and serves in the President’s cabinet,<sup>123</sup> the Texas Attorney General is not part of the Governor’s cabinet or staff, and is not expected to carry out the Governor’s law enforcement priorities and policies.<sup>124</sup> Therefore, relying on the decisions of state courts with respect to the prosecution of state executive branch officials is neither relevant nor helpful in determining whether the President is or should be immune from federal prosecution.

The New York state investigations against the President pending at the time of publication of this Article place front and center the question of whether a state may prosecute a sitting President.<sup>125</sup> No state has ever attempted directly to do so.<sup>126</sup> The closest example is when Vice President

Aaron Burr was indicted by two states in 1804.<sup>127</sup> However, as noted elsewhere, there is a serious difference between the role and responsibilities of the President and the Vice President and how they are treated in our constitutional structure.<sup>128</sup>

Scholars Akhil Reed Amar and Brian C. Kalt argue that the Supreme Court case of McCullough v. Maryland stands for the proposition that states cannot use their power to obstruct the duties of federal agents.<sup>129</sup> In McCullough, Chief Justice Marshall concluded that state officials may not obstruct the “measures of a government created by others as well as themselves, for the benefit of others in common with themselves. The difference is that which always exists, and always must exist, between the action of the whole on a part, and the action of a part on the whole.”<sup>130</sup> At issue here is the concern that one part of the United States would have the power to derail the entire functioning of the nation as a whole.<sup>131</sup>

As with the other issues considered in this Article, there is no judicial precedent on the question of state prosecution of a sitting President.<sup>132</sup> Nevertheless, based on the arguments supporting total federal immunity for official conduct, the President almost certainly enjoys total immunity from state prosecution in connection with official conduct.<sup>133</sup> Furthermore, because of federalism concerns, any and all state prosecutions against a sitting President for unofficial conduct will likely be stayed or deferred until the President no longer holds office.<sup>134</sup> Any state investigation or indictment directly requiring the President’s time and attention would likely also not be permitted. In concluding that a President is immune from state prosecution

See Amar & Kalt, supra note 37, at 14 (“[T]his privilege is not designed to protect the President’s personal interests (although it does, temporarily), but rather the public interest of the People . . .”). Of course, the same reasoning would not apply to any of the President’s private organizations or businesses since none hold federal office.

while in office, Amar and Kalt rely on a structural argument, specifically that the criminal prosecution of a sitting President would divert the President from his or her constitutional duties.<sup>135</sup> Of course, this obstruction would occur regardless of whether the prosecution is by state or federal authorities.<sup>136</sup> However, because federalism concerns would no longer exist once the President leaves office, the states would then be free to prosecute.<sup>137</sup>

D. Confronting the Statute of Limitations Problem

There remains the worrisome complication of the running of the statute of limitations and the possibility that by “running out the clock,” a President could effectively escape accountability.<sup>138</sup> The 1973 OLC Opinion addresses this issue:

In suggesting that an impeachment proceeding is the only appropriate way to deal with a President while in office, we realize that there are certain drawbacks, such as the running of a statute of limitations

137. As of the publication of this Article, President Donald Trump has been named in a state defamation lawsuit by former “The Apprentice” contestant, Ms. Summer Zervos. Tyler Pager, Lawyers for Trump back in Court, Fighting Another Defamation Suit, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 18, 2018, at A28. However, the authority to sue the sitting President in state court for civil matters based on the President’s unofficial conduct is unknown. While Jones held that sitting presidents are not immune from civil suits brought in federal court during their term for conduct unrelated to their official duties, Justice Stevens left undecided whether the same conclusion would be reached in a state court. Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 691–92 (1997). In dictum, Justice Stevens reasoned that if Ms. Jones had brought her case in state court, then she would “presumably rely on federalism and comity concerns, as well as the interest in protecting federal officials from possible local prejudice that underlies the authority to remove certain cases brought against federal officers from a state to a federal court.” Id. Justice Stevens’s federalism consideration finds grounding in McCullough, discussed supra, based on the notion that states may not interfere with legitimate federal objectives. See generally McCullough v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). However, one problem with a federalism argument in this context is that the state takes a more neutral role in civil litigation than it does when acting as prosecutor in a criminal case. In other words, the state is less actively interfering with the President’s objectives when serving as a mere forum for the hearing of private complaints. Furthermore, by downplaying the probability of civil suits against a sitting President, Justice Stevens rejected President Clinton’s immunity argument that a “deluge” of litigation in federal court for unofficial presidential conduct would “engulf the Presidency,” thereby disrupting the President’s official duties. Jones, 520 U.S. at 701–02. Thus, having been rejected in the context of private civil litigation in federal court, state courts may find it easier to reject immunity with respect to state civil litigation. However, it also appears that civil litigation involving the sitting President is more common today than when Jones was decided. See, e.g., Matt Viser, Trump Has Been Sued 134 Times in Federal Court Since Inauguration, BOSTON GLOBE (May 5, 2017), <https://www.bostonglobe.com/news/politics/2017/05/05/trump-has-been-sued-times-federal-court-since-inauguration-day/E4AqZBYaKYHtzwfQ3k9hdM/story.html> [<https://perma.cc/HQB4-CBCG>].

On balance, while concerns over separation of powers and federalism may be different, the Jones decision could well carry significant weight in a state proceeding faced with this issue. With that said, the analysis might be different if Congress passes a statute that gives jurisdiction to state courts to hear such cases or otherwise provides immunity.

while the President is in office, thus preventing any trial for such offenses. In this difficult area all courses of action have costs and we recognize that a situation of the type just mentioned could cause a complete hiatus in criminal liability. We doubt, however, that this gap in the law is sufficient to overcome the arguments against subjecting a President to indictment and criminal trial while in office.<sup>139</sup>

Similar to the 1973 OLC Opinion, the 2000 OLC Opinion concludes that the statute of limitations concern is not one of “significant constitutional weight” when compared to the significant burdens that indictment and prosecution would impose on the office of the President.<sup>140</sup> The opinion goes on to suggest that Congress could enact a special tolling provision for this scenario.<sup>141</sup> Congress has never done so, likely believing that the need for such legislation is so remote as to not be worth the effort to try to pass it.<sup>142</sup> Justice Brett Kavanaugh proposed such a provision in a 1998 article. “The President of the United States,” he wrote, “is not subject to indictment or information under the laws of the United States while he serves as President. The statute of limitations for any offense against the United States committed by the President shall be tolled while he serves as President.”<sup>143</sup> States could also pass a similar tolling statute.<sup>144</sup>

142. See Kavanaugh, supra note 26, at 2157. Prior to the final Senate vote on Justice Brett Kavanaugh’s appointment to the Supreme Court, Senator Susan Collins provided a statement on her evaluation of Justice Kavanaugh and mentioned that his proposal of statutory language to temporarily shield the President from prosecution “suggests that [Kavanaugh] believes that the President does not have such protection currently.” Abigail Abrams, Here’s Sen. Susan Collins’ Full Speech About Voting to Confirm Kavanaugh, TIME (Oct. 5, 2018), <http://time.com/5417444/susan-collins-kavanaugh-vote-transcript/> [<https://perma.cc/67MT-HWB6>] (providing a transcript of Senator Collins’s statement). Senator Collins further stated that she had spoken at length with the then-D.C. Circuit Judge on two separate occasions regarding his judicial views on various topics. Id. While Justice Kavanaugh’s statements during those private conversations cannot be verified, a thorough reading of his articles suggests that he held a much different view—that the Independent Counsel Statute’s grant of vast prosecutorial power created uncertainty as to whether the counsel could prosecute the President, precipitating the need for a statutory amendment to address the ambiguity and clear any doubt. See Kavanaugh, supra note 26, at 2135 (enumerating “[s]everal ‘problems’ with the statute, including its authorization of the ‘independent counsel [to] investigate matters beyond the initial grant of jurisdiction’”). Thus, Justice Kavanaugh’s concern was with the ambiguity of the Independent Counsel Statute, not with the Constitution. Leaving little doubt as to his position, Kavanaugh concluded that the Constitution itself proscribes judicial prosecution of a sitting President: “Thus, as the Constitution suggests, the decision about the President while he is in office should be made where all great national political judgments in our country should be made—in the Congress of the United States.” Id. at 2159.

143. Kavanaugh, supra note 26, at 2157.

144. Of course, practically speaking, only a few jurisdictions would likely see the need to pass such a statute (e.g., the District of Columbia, Virginia, Maryland, and perhaps New York).

E. The Constitution's Answer: Congressional Impeachment

Although a President who engages in unlawful unofficial conduct may not be subject to prosecution until leaving office, the President is always subject to impeachment under Article II, Section 4 of the Constitution.<sup>145</sup> This political process is available to members in Congress who, for reasons of fairness, believe it is essential that the President be held accountable for wrongdoing while in office.<sup>146</sup> Conduct that appears to be aimed at obstructing the search for truth, such as making false statements to investigators, are the types of high crimes and misdemeanors that may constitute grounds for impeachment and removal.<sup>147</sup> If the House of Representatives feels strongly enough, members may certainly try to impeach the President for unofficial acts that appear to be criminal in nature.<sup>148</sup> Impeachment is a rare occurrence—but, as discussed above, the alternative of prosecuting a sitting President raises serious separation of powers issues by placing the power to decide who is President into the hands of the judiciary.<sup>149</sup> Even some commentators who believe that a sitting President can be prosecuted in office agree that, as a matter of prudence, it is preferable to first allow Congress to study the matter as a basis for impeachment and removal proceedings before advancing with a criminal prosecution.<sup>150</sup> This is not to suggest that the President could avoid criminal liability altogether if impeached. Under Article I, Section 3 of the Constitution, once impeached by the House, convicted by the Senate, and removed from office, a former President can be subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.<sup>151</sup>

145. “The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.” U.S. CONST. art. II, § 4.

146. Alexander Hamilton illustrated the grave yet necessary task prescribed to Congress:

A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained in a government wholly elective. The subject of [the Senate's] jurisdiction are those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may with peculiar propriety be denominated POLITICAL, as they related chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself.

THE FEDERALIST NO. 65 (Alexander Hamilton).

148. U.S. CONST. art. II, § 4; see generally 1 RONALD D. ROTUNDA & JOHN E. NOWAK, TREATISE ON CONSTITUTIONAL LAW § 8.10 (5th ed. 2012).

149. See 1998 Subcomm. Hearing, supra note 80, at 6 (statement of Senator Robert G. Torricelli) (“In my own interpretation, it would seem to me to mean that offenses by a President of the United States are to the body public in its entirety, and therefore need to be judged not as narrow abuses against the criminal law but against the body politic, sitting in judgment the U.S. Senate.”).

150. See, e.g., id. at 3–4 (statement of Senator John Ashcroft) (claiming that the sitting President is subject to prosecution but that “prudence dictates that a prosecutor should defer to Congress when impeachment is an option”).

151. U.S. CONST. art I, § 3.

Some may worry that, if the President cannot be prosecuted for wrongdoings committed while in office, then there is nothing to prevent him or her from committing such acts. To the contrary, several mechanisms exist to discourage the President from engaging in what would be criminal behavior, including: checks and balances by other federal branches of government, prosecution after leaving office, state sovereign power afforded by the U.S. Constitution, media scrutiny and attention, the President's desire to preserve his or her reputation in history, and the desire to win re-election.<sup>152</sup>

II. PRODUCTION OF EVIDENCE

Even when a President is not the direct target or subject of a criminal investigation, he or she may have information that is relevant to the inquiry.<sup>153</sup> There are numerous historical examples of presidents voluntarily providing evidence to assist in an investigation; in other instances, their participation has been motivated by the threat of subpoena.<sup>154</sup> However, there is little judicial precedent that answers the question of whether a President who refuses to provide evidence can be compelled to do so and under what circumstances.

During his criminal trial for conspiracy in 1807, Vice President Burr asserted that President Jefferson had a letter in his possession that would exculpate Burr from these charges.<sup>155</sup> Over the President's objections, Chief Justice John Marshall rejected arguments that a sitting President was not subject to compulsory process, and he issued a subpoena to the President, 152. See generally Ronald Brownstein, The Formidable Checks and Balances Imposing on President Trump, THE ATLANTIC (Feb. 16, 2017), <https://www.theatlantic.com/politics/archive/2017/02/trump-constraints-opposition/516825/> [<https://perma.cc/J838-GQ4A>].

153. This Article's discussion proceeds in Part II on an assumption that the President's production of evidence takes place in a context where he or she is a nonparty witness and not the "target" of an investigation. See Kavanaugh, supra note 26, at 2157 (noting that such investigations would be highly politicized); see also Liptak, supra note 20 (President Nixon named as unindicted co-conspirator). This distinction is important in two ways. First, it distinguishes between the President testifying as a nonparty witness and the President testifying as a criminal defendant, the latter of which is a topic more closely related to the discussion of presidential immunity from investigation, indictment, and prosecution. See supra Part I. Second, it recognizes the potential Fifth Amendment rights that the President would have against self-incrimination vis-à-vis the compelled production of incriminating evidence. See generally Leonard G. Ratner, Executive Privilege, Self Incrimination, and the Separation of Powers Illusion, 22 UCLA L. Rev. 92 (1974) (thoroughly examining the implications of United States v. Nixon on Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendment rights). Since the question is whether a court can compel the President to testify or otherwise produce evidence, it is further assumed that in order for this constitutional question to be resolved, the President would assert all rights in his or her favor, challenging a subpoena until the Supreme Court grants certiorari to review the issue.

154. See 1 ROTUNDA & NOWAK, supra note 148, at § 7.1 (listing 16 voluntary and involuntary appearances of Presidents before courts as witnesses).

directing that he turn over the letter.<sup>156</sup> President Jefferson turned over the letter to the government, but his act was largely voluntary in that he retained control over when, where, and how he would produce the letter, to which Chief Justice Marshall acquiesced.<sup>157</sup>

Similarly, in 1998, Independent Counsel Ken Starr directed a grand jury to issue a subpoena to President Clinton for testimony relating to the Whitewater and Lewinsky investigations.<sup>158</sup> The subpoena prompted negotiations between Starr and the President's legal team, and resulted in the President's agreeing to testify voluntarily before the grand jury, rather than under legal compulsion. In exchange, Starr agreed to withdraw the subpoena.<sup>159</sup>

While the 1973 OLC Opinion and the 2000 OLC Opinion appear to draw a clear line against criminal prosecution of a sitting President, the opinions do not directly address other types of criminal process, such as compelled oral testimony. The 1973 OLC Opinion discusses the fact that President Jefferson did not want to appear in person in the Burr Trial, but it does not conclude that he did not have to.<sup>160</sup> It simply points out that the courts have always given great deference to the President's time and schedule.<sup>161</sup> The 2000 OLC Opinion goes further still, speaking about the U.S. Supreme Court Case of United States v. Nixon and constitutional balancing.<sup>162</sup> Nowhere do either of the two OLC opinions say explicitly that the President is immune from all criminal process.

The Congressional Research Service (CRS) works exclusively for Congress and provides policy and legal analyses to committees and members of both the House and Senate. The CRS is viewed as nonpartisan, and its work is considered credible by members from both major political parties. In May 2018, the CRS released a memorandum entitled "Compelling Presidential Compliance with a Judicial Subpoena" (the "CRS Report"), which examines the history of presidents responding to judicial subpoenas and various cases relating to presidential immunity from

While some commentators suggest that the subpoena was a subpoena ad testificandum for oral testimony, it was most likely a subpoena duces tecum for the production of a letter. Id. at 1447. If this is true, it significantly weakens any argument claiming that the Burr case is dispositive of the current issue of a sitting President's compelled oral testimony.

compulsory process.<sup>163</sup> The CRS Report concluded that the applicable judicial cases establish two important principles:

First, with regard to accountability, it is clear that the President is not absolutely immune from all judicial compulsory process. The Court has “unequivocally and emphatically endorsed” the principle that the President may be made to comply with a criminal subpoena for documentary evidence, and that he is subject to civil proceedings for unofficial acts. Second, the President is not to be treated like any other official, thus the Constitution prevents the courts from subjecting the President to judicial requirements that impede him from carrying out his Article II duties in violation of the separation of powers. For this reason, the President is not subject to civil suits for damages in cases arising from his official acts.<sup>164</sup>

The balancing approach embraced by the CRS is consistent with the views of former Solicitor General Ted Olson.<sup>165</sup> After reminding us that there is no precedent on the issue, Mr. Olson explains that although the President is unique, he is not above the law—that is, sometimes the President must comply with judicial process.<sup>166</sup> Regarding a request for oral testimony, Olson speaks in terms of a presumption privilege:

While the President’s presumptive privilege against compulsive testimony would be entitled to considerable deference, that claim could be overcome if the prosecutor makes a strong case showing that he must have specific essential evidence that is not procurable from other sources and that he is not simply engaged in a fishing expedition.<sup>167</sup>

If a President can be compelled to provide testimony in a civil case, then surely one might argue that the President can be compelled to do so in more serious proceedings, such as criminal trials, which often implicate matters of greater public interest than private damage claims.<sup>168</sup> Furthermore, because discovery often takes more time in civil cases than criminal cases, some commenters claim that Jones should be dispositive on the issue of providing evidence in a criminal case because civil cases often take more time than criminal cases in terms of discovery.<sup>169</sup> However, it is important to note (as does the CRS Report) that while permitting the civil suit to proceed in Jones, the Court there clearly avoided the question of compelled presidential testimony.<sup>170</sup>

On May 17, 2018, Professor Ryan Goodman interviewed Professor Douglas W. Kmiec, the former Assistant Attorney General and head of the OLC, concerning an unpublished OLC opinion (the “1988 OLC Opinion”) that appears to be at odds with the CRS Report’s conclusion that a President may sometimes be subject to criminal process.<sup>171</sup> Professor Kmiec stated that the 1988 OLC Opinion, cited in footnote 29 of the 2000 OLC Opinion, stood for the proposition that the President was immune from all criminal process, including both direct prosecution, and the compelled production of documents and oral testimony.<sup>172</sup> In his interview with Professor Goodman, Professor Kmiec explains that the OLC has concluded that a sitting President may not be indicted and is immune from criminal process, including a subpoena. When Assistant Attorney General Moss in the 2000 opinion refers to immunity from “indictment and prosecution,” I believe him to be using the word “prosecution” to include all the regular means of prosecution – e.g, demands for testimony documentation, etc.<sup>173</sup>

With respect, Professor Kmiec’s assertion is questionable for the following reasons. First, this assertion would appear to be contradicted by Nixon v. Fitzgerald, where the Court affirmed that the separation of powers does not require presidential immunity from all compulsory judicial process.<sup>174</sup> That case clearly informs us that a President can be compelled to produce documentary evidence.<sup>175</sup> Second, even if Professor Kmiec’s interpretation of the 1988 OLC Opinion were accurate, the opinion would only reflect the formal position of the Justice Department until it was preempted or withdrawn; the 2000 OLC Opinion would clearly override the 1988 OLC Opinion and be the operative Department of Justice guidance on this question today.<sup>176</sup> At best, the 1988 OLC Opinion may be read to mean that although the President is immune from prosecution, he or she is not necessarily totally immune from the production of evidence based upon the vital need for information in connection with a criminal proceeding.

One point is fairly certain—courts draw a clear line of distinction between providing documents and giving oral testimony.<sup>177</sup> There appears to be less protection for a President from having to provide written documents relevant to a criminal investigation.<sup>178</sup> We know from United States v. Nixon that under certain limited circumstances, the President can be compelled to turn over documentary evidence essential in a criminal prosecution.<sup>179</sup>

In reviewing case law, opinions from the Justice Department, and writings from commentators and former government officials, it appears that with respect to the production of documents, the courts will likely apply a balancing test, one that balances the needs for justice against the needs of the President to discharge presidential duties and faithfully execute the law.<sup>180</sup> It seems certain that the President, under certain circumstances, will be required to provide documentary testimony when the testimony is relevant, necessary, and otherwise unavailable.<sup>181</sup> Even then, however, he or she may refuse to provide documentary evidence by asserting executive privilege based on legitimate national security, diplomatic, or military concerns.<sup>182</sup> Whether a President can be compelled to provide oral

Jones*, 520 U.S. 681, 691–92 (1997).

178. This is due largely in part to concerns about the President’s ability to tend to his or her official duties. It arguably takes less of the President’s time to relinquish documents than it does to appear in person and testify, which would also involve the time to prepare for oral testimony. testimony presents a more difficult question; in large part, this is due to the significant time and attention the President would need to expend in order to prepare for and give oral testimony—time when the President is forced to step away from his or her constitutionally-assigned duties.<sup>183</sup>

In criminal cases where oral testimony is sought from the President, the prosecution must overcome a heightened burden of need and relevance, demonstrating to the court that the evidence is necessary and unavailable elsewhere. However, even in those situations where the prosecution meets a heightened burden, given the serious duties of the President, the courts will likely afford the President great latitude and discretion with respect to the time, place, and manner of providing such oral testimony.<sup>184</sup> For example, the President would most likely not be required to give testimony in court or before a grand jury.<sup>185</sup> Given the demands of his or her schedule, the President would also likely be allowed to provide written answers to interrogatories or give a taped interview or deposition from the White House.<sup>186</sup>

Finally, we must remember that while the President may be immune from criminal prosecution while in office—and enjoy some immunity with respect to providing evidence—the President is not immune from impeachment.<sup>187</sup> Consequently, if the President provides evidence, he or she must be truthful or else risk a perjury offense.<sup>188</sup> As noted earlier, lying before a grand jury or before federal prosecutors is the type of high crime and misdemeanor that might support charges of impeachment and subsequent removal from office.<sup>189</sup> connection with periodic reports that he is preparing to grant a large number of additional pardons, speculation abounds about whether a President has the authority to issue a self-pardon.<sup>191</sup> Although this is a question that has not been squarely addressed in our courts,<sup>192</sup> many scholars and historians believe such an attempted exercise of power is inconsistent with the traditions of United States law and our founding principles.<sup>193</sup>

Clemency is an “act of grace” by the sovereign.<sup>194</sup> The federal pardon power lies exclusively with the President, and Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution expressly limits that power in only two regards: (1) the pardonable offense must be a federal law offense, and (2) the pardon power cannot be used in cases of impeachment.<sup>195</sup> Importantly, the Constitution does not speak to self-pardons. Since the Constitution expressly limits the pardon power in certain ways but does not expressly forbid self-pardons, the courts may well conclude that a President has the power to grant a self-pardon. The text of the Constitution simply allows no other reasonable conclusion—there is no bar to self-pardons.<sup>196</sup> As such, it is immaterial whether a self-pardon is issued for criminal conduct before or after assuming office.<sup>197</sup>

Those who share the opposing view argue that a self-pardon places the President above the law.<sup>198</sup> Finding no express support in the words of the Constitution, critics retreat to the old adage that “no man should be the judge in his own case.”<sup>199</sup> However, if the law does not prohibit the practice, then arguably the President does not place himself above the law with a self-pardon, just as no one else is placed above the law when they receive a pardon from the Chief Executive.<sup>200</sup> In these instances, the recipient of the pardon escapes the usual consequences of criminal wrongdoing that are imposed by law. Furthermore, when granting a pardon, the President is not acting as a judge to adjudicate guilt or innocence. A judge has no authority to grant a pardon; the pardon power is an executive power, one expressly reserved to the Chief Executive.<sup>201</sup>

Article II, Section 3 of the Constitution requires the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.<sup>202</sup> Some opponents of self-pardons contend that Section 3 establishes a trust with the American people that is violated if the President grants a self-pardon.<sup>203</sup> But if in granting a self-pardon the President violates the trust of the American people, then he or she arguably violates that trust each time a pardon is granted to someone who has taken an oath to faithfully execute the laws of the United States but has then failed to faithfully follow the law.<sup>204</sup> So long as the President does not grant a pardon for a non-federal offense or in cases of impeachment, the President is arguably faithfully executing the law.<sup>205</sup>

Our Founders fought a revolutionary war to escape the tyranny of a British king. They established a government in which power is intentionally dispersed between three co-equal branches.<sup>206</sup> The suggestion that in drafting a constitution they intended to vest power in the Chief Executive to pardon himself from criminal abuses of power seems counterintuitive. However, having just experienced the unfettered discretion of a king, they surely must have been sensitive to the potential abuse of the pardon

See Scott Ingram, Presidents, Politics, and Pardons: Washington's Original (Mis?)Use of the Pardon Power, 8 WAKE FOREST J.L. & POL'Y 259, 317 (2018) (arguing that “[w]e need to scrutinize pardons more thoroughly to understand their motivations”). Ingram argues that the pardon power as used in American presidential practice has rarely been used for one reason alone. See id. Furthermore, Ingram contends that among the motivations, policy is often paramount—but that such policy considerations are not necessarily a misuse of the pardon power, for “[i]t is better to have a pardon policy than to randomly award policies for no reason.” Id. While Ingram does not mention self-pardons in his article, his historical analysis suggests that popular concern for self-pardons is not so much driven by morality as it is politics: “What Washington’s pardon practice tells us is that pardons have always been tinged with political considerations.” Id. at 316.

206. THE FEDERALIST NO. 47 (James Madison) (“The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether or one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny.”).

power.<sup>207</sup> The Founders could have easily drafted the Constitution to prohibit self-pardons; perhaps they did not do so because they viewed the possibility of a self-pardon to be so absurd that they did not think it worth addressing.<sup>208</sup> Alternatively, it is possible that they believed all wrongdoing by a President should be addressed through the political process of impeachment, which falls outside the scope of the pardon power.<sup>209</sup>

How the courts would rule on the legality of a self-pardon is unclear. It would depend in large measure on how judges understand their role in interpreting the Constitution and on their views of the scope of presidential immunity.<sup>210</sup> If the President commits a federal crime, issues a self-pardon, and either resigns or is impeached, the President effectively escapes federal criminal liability for the offense.<sup>211</sup> This may seem unfair, but being forced to forfeit the office of the presidency is itself a serious penalty.<sup>212</sup> Many historians and scholars would likely judge a self-pardon with contempt, and the former President would still be subject to state criminal liability. Whatever the legal authority, a self-pardon would send tremors throughout Congress and likely unsettle many law-abiding Americans.<sup>213</sup> While the President may have the power to self-pardon, this is almost certainly a circumstance where it would be wiser not to test the limits of executive power.

CONCLUSION

At the conclusion of his investigation, Special Counsel Robert Mueller will likely present his findings and recommendations to his supervisor, the Kurland & Ralph Lerner eds., 2000). James Wilson opposed the motion, arguing that the impeachment power provided a sufficient process by which such presidential abuses could be kept in check. Id. Ultimately, Randolph’s motion lost by a vote of 8–2, and the language was omitted. Id.

210. The Court has exhibited a wide range of opinions on presidential immunity. Compare Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731, 754 (1982) (absolute civil damages immunity for official conduct), with Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 694–95 (1997) (no civil damages immunity for unofficial conduct).

Reg. 32601 (Sept. 18, 1974) (President Ford choosing not to further expose former President Nixon “to further punishment and degradation” after he had “already paid the unprecedented penalty of relinquishing the highest elective office of the United States”).

213. Due to the potential outcry, one scholar has proposed a constitutional amendment to exclude use of the pardon power “for the President’s Spouse, Children, Siblings, Parents, or Self.” Nida & Spiro, supra note 192, at 221.

Deputy Attorney General.<sup>214</sup> If the Special Counsel concludes the evidence supports a finding that the President engaged in criminal wrongdoing outside his official duties, the Justice Department will have to determine whether or not to stand with the previous OLC conclusions that a criminal prosecution must be deferred until the President no longer holds office.<sup>215</sup> It is possible, assuming the facts support it, that the Department will modify its legal conclusion and allow Special Counsel Mueller to prosecute the President under the theory that while a President cannot be prosecuted for erroneous decisions when exercising clear presidential authority or performing official acts,<sup>216</sup> a President can be subject to criminal liability for unofficial acts—actions while in office that are unrelated to presidential duties and that are motivated by personal or political gain.<sup>217</sup> It is also possible that leadership in the Department of Justice will conclude, as did Mr. Jaworski and Mr. Starr,<sup>218</sup> that a sitting President can be prosecuted for unofficial acts, and yet, like Jaworski and Starr, decide first to let congressional impeachment proceedings play out as the more prudent and appropriate course.<sup>219</sup>

Undoubtedly, any indictment would be challenged by the President based on the reasons articulated in previous OLC opinions.<sup>220</sup> A legal challenge based on conduct arguably not associated with political fitness would place the courts in the difficult role of evaluating and potentially second-guessing actions, decisions, and statements historically reserved to the discretion and political judgment of the elected branches. As discussed earlier, one can predict the difficulty in formulating a clear rule to determine the dividing line between unofficial acts subject to prosecution and those that are not because they constitute official acts.<sup>221</sup> The outcome of such a constitutional battle is unclear; however, unelected judges would be wise to tread carefully since their involvement could set the nation on a path that

216. This is the primary theory underlying the Supreme Court decision in Fitzgerald, granting absolute immunity for civil damages suits to the President for official conduct. Nixon v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731, 754 (1982).

217. See Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681, 685–86 (1997) (President Clinton’s conduct prior to entering office “unrelated to any of his official duties as President of the United States”).

218. It should be noted that Special Prosecutor Jaworski and Independent Counsel Starr operated under a different statutory scheme than that of the current investigation by Special Counsel Mueller. These different legal scenarios likely affected their conclusions. See, e.g., ROTUNDA MEMO, supra note 33, at 2 (“Nor do I consider whether the President could be indicted if there were no Independent Counsel statute.”).

219. JAWORSKI STAFF MEMO, supra note 100, at 20; ROTUNDA MEMO, supra note 34, at 55.

220. For example, the President might argue that the burden of responding to criminal process is much greater than participating in civil litigation and thus constitutes an unconstitutional disruption of his duties. See 2000 OLC MEMO, supra note 58, at 260 (reaffirming the OLC’s position stated in the 1973 OLC Memo that “indictment and criminal prosecution of a sitting President would unduly interfere with the ability of the executive branch to perform its constitutionally assigned duties”).

ends with the conviction and subsequent removal of a democratically-elected President.<sup>222</sup>

Even if the Department of Justice continues to stand behind its current position that it will defer prosecution for criminal unofficial conduct, there are legitimate reasons the Special Counsel should continue his investigation.<sup>223</sup> The most obvious is that the Department of Justice may decide to prosecute the President once he is out of office. A better reason to continue the investigation is that other individuals not cloaked with the same immunity as the President may have engaged in wrongdoing.<sup>224</sup> Indeed, there have already been several indictments and plea agreements—as well as a plea deal and conviction—arising out of the Special Counsel’s investigation.<sup>225</sup>

Importantly, whether or not a President can be prosecuted, compelled to provide evidence, or “self-pardoned,” we as a nation have to deal with the reality—based on the sworn testimony and more recent public statements of the heads of our intelligence community—that Russia interfered in the 2016 presidential election, and that they intend to interfere in future American elections.<sup>226</sup> The protection of our national security demands that we understand fully the actions and methods of the Russian government, and we must hold this adversary accountable. For this reason alone, the investigation by Special Counsel Mueller into Russian meddling in the 2016 election should be allowed to continue to its conclusion.

Finally, while the Special Counsel may not have the constitutional authority to prosecute a sitting President who commits a crime, the Department of Justice certainly has the power to refer the Special Counsel's findings and recommendations to Congress.<sup>227</sup> If those findings include serious criminal wrongdoing arising out of unofficial acts, it remains to be seen whether Congress will hold the President accountable. The decision whether to impeach and remove a sitting President will provide the toughest test of our system of checks and balances since the days of Watergate.

APPENDIX A
Explanatory Hypotheticals

The following examples are hypothetical in nature only. Their purpose is to apply the conclusions of this Article to real-world scenarios. Assume that the President obstructs justice. Suppose further this act violates both state and federal laws. Finally, assume it is unofficial conduct. Based on the considerations and conclusions in this Article, here are six general scenarios and their respective outcomes:

The President resigns. Without the shield of a pardon, the former President would be completely exposed to criminal prosecution in both federal and state courts, and since double jeopardy does not preclude federal and state prosecutions for the same crime, the former President could be charged in both for the same offense.

The President does nothing. The President could not be prosecuted until out of office based on deferment. The President would be subject to impeachment and removal from office. The former President would then be completely exposed to criminal prosecution in both federal and state courts.

The President issues a self-pardon and stays in office. The President's pardon shields the President from criminal liability for federal crimes, but not for state crimes. However, any state prosecution would be deferred. The President would be subject to impeachment and removal from office. After removal or the end of the President's term in office, the former President could be prosecuted by state courts.

The President issues a self-pardon and resigns. Again, the former President would be immune from prosecution for federal crimes but not state crimes. State prosecutors could still indict and prosecute the President.

The House impeaches the President; the President issues a self-pardon; the Senate votes to remove. The President remains subject to removal from office. Here, the pardon is likely void and unconstitutional because it is being used in a case of impeachment. The President will be subject to prosecution in federal and state courts following removal.

The House impeaches; the Senate votes not to remove; the President issues a self-pardon. In this unlikely scenario, the President is impeached but is not successfully removed. After the failed Senate vote, the President issues a self-pardon. In this case, it could be argued that the impeachment event is over once the case becomes congressionally moot, that is, after an unsuccessful attempt by Congress to remove the President for the articles of impeachment voted against the President. Since impeachment proceedings are not indefinite (e.g., Clinton remained in office after the Senate failed to remove), they will end, and the President can arguably issue a self-pardon. Again, the President would remain exposed to state prosecution after the end of the term of office or earlier resignation.
